

Assessing Your Current Reactions to Stress

Self-care can minimize your stress and act as an antidote to many of the stressors that you may face each day working at a nonprofit.

How to Use:

Put an "X" to signify "Yes" you engage in the behavior or "No" you don't. Pay attention to any tendency you might have toward self-deception. The truth might be ugly or embarrassing, but use it as your catalyst for change.

When you are under stress, do	Yes	No	When you are under stress, do	Yes	No
you:			you:
Smoke/Use Tobacco			Engage in physical activity at least 3 times a week for 30 minutes
Consume more than 2-3 cups of			Get 7-9 hours of sleep per night
caffeinated drinks per day
Drink more than 1-2 alcoholic			Maintain healthy alcoholic drinking beverages per day			habits – if any Misuse over the counter			Find time to relax throughout your medications			day/week as needed
Misuse prescription medications			Meditate
Participate in illegal drug use			Find different ways to manage stress

Over or under eat	Maintain healthy eating habits
Spend too much money	Maintain healthy ritual and routines
Engage in risky sexual behavior	Maintain relationships with family or friends
Sleep too much	Walk in the woods
Have angry outbursts	Find ways to manage your anger
Blame yourself for anything that	Practice positive self-talk goes wrong
Overwork or underwork	Play
Stay silent about problems	Verbalize what you're struggling with in a professional manner
Other	Other
NEGATIVE SELF-CARE	POSITIVE SELF-CARE
BEHAVIORS TALLY	BEHAVIORS TALLY

If you answer more "Yeses" in the left column than the right column, then you are choosing to react to your stress in negative ways. Think about ways you can replace your negative stress reactions and behaviors with more positive ones. Hint: Self-care activities are a good start. The checklists can help you identify a whole range of self-care practices available to you as alternative ways of dealing with your stress.